The company operates primarily a few routes connecting Boston to suburban communities in southeastern Massachusetts and Cape Cod, as well as charters and sightseeing services. History The P and B was established in 1888 as a trolley company in Plymouth and Kingston, Massachusetts. At its peak, the trolleys operated as far as Pembroke and Sagamore Beach. Until 1928, the company operated trolleys, when they only used buses on and around the South Shore. [1] Operations The P and B operates primarily three different lines. The first is the main line, connecting Hyannis, Massachusetts and Boston Logan International Airport, which operates up to 29 times a day. This route is mainly used by commuters and airport travelers in a park and the way of driving. The second line, which operates much less frequently, connects Logan Airport from Boston to Provincetown on Cape Cod. Finally, the P and B organizes a seasonal tour of Plymouth city centre in the summer. [3] Stops The following table details a list of plymouth and Brockton stops for their regular regional service. Billions of dollars were injected into businesses earlier this year through the Federal PayCheck Protection Program — a program administered by the Small Business Administration as a forgivable loan designed to directly encourage a small business to keep its workers on the payroll. But not everyone uses it that way. Plymouth - Brockton Street Railway Co., the bus line that, prior to the pandemic, made more trips between Cape Town and Boston than any other supplier, uses it more as a traditional loan that the company would have to repay. The company put the brakes on service in March and the wheels have not restarted since, even though the company was approved for a PPP loan of between $1 million and $2 million by the Small Business Administration. The company has taken out a loan, B spokesman Jim Farrell said, but has not yet spent. There are different ways to use the PPP and it doesn't need to be used to get employees back to work right away, according to Farrell. The talk you hear a lot is about having a loan forgiven by the SBA and that's usually whether they're used entirely or primarily to keep people on the payroll, he said. Your paycheck protection is essentially a loan and if a company doesn't ask for a pardon, they pay it back. That is essentially what I think is going to happen here. This decision makes sense for Charles Ryan, the union representative of the drivers and mechanics of the company. He was not angry that doesn't sink to the workers right now. Its members are unemployed and received the additional $600 per week before the August expiry. He believed that the loan would keep their jobs in the future, instead of paying its workers now. Ryan did not see why the company should bring them back when there is little demand. Drivers would probably be laid off again when the money runs out and their health would be put on the line in the meantime. From where I stand, it makes no sense to bring them back, burn through the loan P and; B got them and then sent them back, Ryan said. Farrell and Ryan, as well as Plymouth- Brockton CEO Winthrop Sargent in a previous interview with The Times, said the demand is not there to keep the buses between Cape Town and Boston going. Travel is usually full of commuters and people destined for Logan Airport. But people work from home, the airport is empty and Cape Codders are not as attracted to the city as they were before the pandemic. The fact that the P-B is the only major local carrier that doesn't work is a problem that seems to upset some dedicated B.P. riders. People are really ticked off, said Michael Thomson, who used to regularly take the bus from Hyannis to Boston for his consulting work. What the company is doing seems to run counter to the spirit of the PPP program, he said. There is no service for any of these communities and they have been given all that money, Said Thomson. The goal of the program was to keep people employed. Ryan and Farrell said it's a tough time to be in the bus industry and the industry, apart from PPP loans, has not received money through coronavirus aid packages like other modes of transportation. The company wants to get the buses up and running as soon as possible, but there is no certain date. They are as eager to resume service as I think all the passengers who have relied on them in the past, Farrell said. I mean no one has an extended period of time not being able to get the buses on the road. They just want to make it very, very certain that when they do, passenger safety is in the front and center.
